

Donald Trump Elections

By: Kyleigh Martin

Donald Trump has declared that he will be running for re-election in 2024. Trump has been posting about re-running since President Biden got elected. There are many people disagreeing with Trump's decision, The New York Times is one of the best news sites out there, and they disagree. I personally on the other hand don't disagree with Trump going up for re-election.

The New York Times has a different perspective on Trump wanting to get re-elected. "His new campaign has begun with the same ugliness, lies, and chaos as the last, but it poses even greater dangers to American democracy," says The New York Times in their latest article about how much they disagree with Trump going up again for elections. They also believe that Trump is unfit for the Presidential position, they don't believe we should have much trust in Trump. "If he is elected, a second Trump term would lack whatever guardrails were in place during the first. Over the course of those four years, Mr. Trump grew bolder in his defiance of the other branches of government, disregard for the law, and flagrant abuses of presidential power." I hope that The New York Times has their words correct.

I personally agree that Trump should go for re-election, Trump may have made some awful decisions, but I believe that everybody deserves a second chance. I do agree that he has made some terrible decisions, but how can somebody prove their worth without getting a chance to show it? I hope Trump can handle the many haters he has brought upon himself because they are going to have many opinions.

Many people have opinions in presidential elections, but we are all together during this. So we should deal with this together, instead of turning against each other even though we have our differences.