

He must be stopped

By: Madeline Infalvi

Fanboys can be found almost anywhere, and usually associate themselves with a fandom. These men have dedicated their lives to their obsession and are not afraid to show it; however, it is extremely dangerous for these young men to act like this. Fanboys oftentimes express their feelings and emotions online, but some of this content is extremely concerning. Most Fanboys consist of younger men, typically teenagers. At their young age, obsessive behaviors can lead to long term effects, and seriously damage future relationships.

Fanboys have unrealistic standards of relationships and life, and they must come to the realization that these things will not be reality. These men idolize their obsession, and it seems to be the only thing that can please them. Their obsessive behaviors are also very repulsive to people, who would want to spend their time with someone who can only talk or think about one thing. They spend their time, energy, and money on their obsession, and from the outside it can certainly be a turn off. Twitter is certainly a hot spot for these men, they can share relatable post tweets and pictures, and it's where they can find people just like them. But it is not healthy to spend lots of time on social media and only having online "friends" at a young age. This will certainly affect the way they socialize with others. We must help these men until it is too late.

But some of the most important information to support this case is the shattering statistic that domestic violence increases 38% during the World Cup. Perhaps these men should learn from women, and be less emotional.